

This is actually not my first time listening to the last lecture, I first heard it my senior year of highschool, and even then and until today I have strongly agreed with its sentiment. But rewatching it was certainly a great refresher and this time around there was a quote that really stuck with me that I completely glossed over the first time "It is a shame that people perceive you as so arrogant it will really limit what you can do in life". Most of the lecture is about pursuing your dreams and learning how to lead your life and what was said I agree with and always have for the most part. While good to hear it does not really challenge me with something new, but that line is something I have been struggling with recently. I have always had the confidence that I could do what I put my mind to, and because of that and my trouble with accepting help I can sometimes come off as a bit prideful in some situations. I am aware I do it but it is just a part of how I act and I have been working on it. That quote really helped me reframe things and gave me a lot to think about in conjunction with some certain recent events, so I really am grateful to rewatch this.
